State Health warns: Take precautions, avoid hantavirus

CDPHE 4/29) – State health officials this week warned Coloradans to avoid hantavirus exposure. There have been two confirmed cases of hantavirus in the state this year, one of which resulted in death.

Hantavirus is a serious and potentially fatal respiratory disease carried by deer mice. People become infected by breathing in dirt and dust contaminated with deer mouse urine and feces. The Colorado Department of Public Health and Environment has documented more than 90 cases of hantavirus across the state since it began tracking the disease in 1993. Approximately 40 percent of people who were infected died.

Coloradans are most likely to get hantavirus when they are exposed to deer mouse urine and feces in and around their homes. Unlike house mice, deer mice have large ears and eyes and white undersides. More people contract hantavirus in the early spring and summer, often when they are cleaning up yards and outbuildings.

"Be particularly careful where there is evidence mice have been in and around buildings or wood or junk piles," said Dr. Jennifer House, state public health veterinarian. "If you have deer mice around your home, assume there is some risk of exposure to this virus. The more mice there are, the greater the risk." House advises:

- Remove wood, junk and brush piles near your home. Store firewood at least 100 feet from your house. Keep vegetation around the house well-trimmed.

- Open windows and doors for at least 30 minutes before cleaning sheds and outbuildings.

- Spray accumulated dust, dirt and rodent droppings with a mixture of bleach and water (1½ cups of household bleach to one gallon of water).

- Wear rubber, latex or vinyl gloves when cleaning.

- Never vacuum or sweep areas where there is evidence of rodent infestation.

Initial hantavirus symptoms include fever, body aches, headache and vomiting. The symptoms begin from one to six weeks after exposure and can progress quickly to respiratory distress within one to five days. Infected people may have a dry cough and difficulty breathing.

"If you become ill with these symptoms, tell your physician about possible exposures to rodent-infested environments," House said. "If hantavirus is suspected, early admission to a hospital for careful monitoring is critical."

Because there is no effective treatment for the disease, House emphasized prevention as the key. She advised year-round rodent control, both in and outside the home.

Answers to Questions sent to E-The Environmental Magazine

Dear EarthTalk: How can I tell if the green certifications and labels on all kinds of products these days are legitimate or just 'greenwashing'?

—Paul Bass, New York, NY
AS SUSTAINABILITY becomes more mainstream, more and more products today advertise their green credentials—with many displaying third-party certifications on their labels. But how can consumers know which certifications are legit?
Americans' confidence in green labels reached a low in 2011 when the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) busted "Tested Green" for selling unverified environmental certifications backed up by unqualified "experts" at supposedly independent firms that were actually owned by the same person. Tested Green used its website and mass e-mails to drum up more than 100 customers—and six figure revenues—falsely claiming to be the "nation's leading certification program with over 45,000 certifications in the United States."
According to the FTC, the company never tested any of the companies it certified and instead awarded use of its label and a link to a "certification verification page" on its website for any customer willing to spend $189.95 on a "Rapid" certification, or $549.95 for a "Pro" certification.

Tested Green is far from the only such case the FTC has pursued. The agency has investigated thousands of cases of misleading green labeling and works hard to ferret out and shut down offenders. "It's no secret that consumers want products that are environmentally friendly, and that companies are trying to meet that need," says Jessica Rich, director of the FTC's Bureau of Consumer Protection. "But companies that don't have evidence to support the environmental claims they make about their products erode consumer confidence and undermine those companies that are playing by the rules."
The FTC also hopes to stem the rising tide of greenwashing through publication of its free Green Guides, which help companies understand the general principles that apply to all environmental marketing claims, how consumers are likely to interpret particular claims and how to substantiate such claims, and how to back up claims to avoid deceiving consumers.

First released in 1992 and revised most recently in 2012, the latest version incorporates guidance on the use of third-party certification seals and claims about carbon offsets and "renewable" materials and energy sources.
For their part, consumers should investigate any green certification labels they see on products to ascertain whether or not they are valid. Some of the certifications we know we can all trust include the federal government's USDA Organic label for organically produced food, the ENERGY STAR label for energy efficient electronics and appliances; independent agency certifications from Cradle to Cradle for manufacturers, the Rainforest Alliance for coffee and other tropical agricultural goods, the Forest Stewardship Council for timber and wood producers, and the U.S. Green Building Council's LEED program for construction and building. Perhaps the granddaddy of all third-party eco-certifications is Green Seal, which has certified thousands of businesses, government agencies and non-profits since its inception in 1989 and essentially started the green labeling movement.

While some regional, industry and proprietary labels may be valid as well, buyers should be wary of any certifications they haven't heard of or can't verify via a quick check online. One way to find out if an eco label is legit is by checking it out on the Ecolabel Index, the largest global directory of sustainability oriented certification labels, currently tracking 463 ecolabels in 199 countries across 25 industry sectors.
